England's Holdings Light.

If the fall of prices in England incombent, upon the export of gold from England becomes sharp and distressing, London will again unload upon the local market American securities. It is fortunate that England's holdings of American securities are comparatively light, and that our level of values is very low. Under such circumstances, while the crisis in England cannot cause a reflux panic in the United States, it can prevent rising markets, and perhaps force lower prices temporarily. The recent unfortu-
